DUCK HUNTERS MUST DO A LOT OF CONSULTING

In Order to Keep within Laws,
but Fowls Will Not Likely Wait.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 8.—If it were early morning and you were a duck hunter in hip boots in the marshes of Minnesota and should see a fine flock of fat mallards drop down within easy range, what would you do?

If you wanted to be absolutely sure of not violating the federal migratory bird law you might do as follows:

First, consult an almanac to see whether the sun has officially risen for, under the law, you must not shoot before sunrise.

Second, consult an ornithologist to make sure the ducks are not of the restricted variety.

Third, consult a geography to discover whether you are "on the banks of the Mississippi between Minneapolis and Memphis."

Lawyer, Too.
Fourth, consult a lawyer as to whether the federal law prohibits the killing of ducks which the state law permits you to shoot.

Then shoot.

But by that time the ducks will probably be raising the same questions for hunters many miles away. States over which migratory wild fowl take their flight will be closely affected by the forthcoming decision of the United States Supreme Court on the federal migratory bird law. A test case has been carried from the Arkansas courts up to the highest tribunal in the land. It concerns three wild ducks which a hunter shot out of season purposely, to test the law.

Conflict of Laws.
The difficulty various states are having over the migratory bird law has arisen out of its conflict with state laws. The federal law fixes different seasons for many states laws for the killing of different kinds of wild fowl. For instance, a state may declare an open season but a hunter who shoots a certain kind of wild fowl that season is regarded as guilty under federal laws. For this reason hunters all over the country are very much up in the air.

The decision of the supreme court is expected to settle things definitely so that hunters may know when and what birds to shoot. The federal authorities declare the restrictions provided by the federal law are absolutely necessary for an adequate protection of the fast disappearing wild fowl. The migratory bird law was enacted after a long fight, conducted principally by the national association of audubon societies. The department of agriculture, in an official statement just issued, says in the two years the federal migratory bird law has been in effect reports from federal game wardens and officers show the increase in water fowl to be from ten to several hundred per cent, according to locality.
